A doctor in Scotland made a nerve and bone all-healing salve, and thought he would complement a bottle with it. He did so, and sent it off. He got some of the nerve to the person. A few days after he received some letters from the patient asking for a bottle of the same. He said the wife has been "guilt-pushin" for seven days with the bone-ointment, and for a week of the nerve. He said he must have it by the next mail, or the wife would be a corpse. He sent it off by return mail, and in a few days received a letter from the husband, saying that the bone-ointment was all right, but the nerve was a mistake. He had been "guilt-pushin" with the nerve, and the wife was dead before night," and he went to try the bone-ointment on her. "Please send me another box." [Here's a chance for a joke.—Ed.]

—Just read about an unfortunate editor, who, in the absence of his wife, undertook to make a pudding. He says he put in a quart of milk, a pint of molasses, a pound of raisins, a pound of flour, a pound of butter, a pound of sugar, a dozen eggs, a little saleratus, and a little salt, and then added a little more flour to make it stiff enough to stand alone. He says he put it in a pan and put it in the oven, and then went to the office to write an article on the "Duties of Husbands." He says he wrote a column and a half, and then went home to see how the pudding was getting along. He says he found the pudding had run all over the oven, and was burning up. He says he opened the door, and the pudding all jumped out of the pan and ran under the bed. He says he got down on his hands and knees and looked under the bed, and the pudding was under the middle of the bed. He says he got a broom and punched the pudding from under the bed, and it ran out into the middle of the floor. He says he then got a shovel and undertook to shovel the pudding into the pan, but it would not stay in the pan. He says he then got mad, and kicked the pudding out of the door, and it ran down the street and he never saw it again. He says he then went to bed, and that is the last he knows about it.

The Bear's Wedding.

WHILE THE CASTLE SLUMBS THE ARTIST LOVER MAY HOPE TO WIN.

Whenever the bear of a flower goes a courting he proceeds in the following somewhat singular manner. He natives himself in his best apparel, puts a bud into pipe in his mouth without the pipe the flower is neither here nor there; presents the most spirited horse he can lay his hands on, to make a christmas impression on the subject of his affections, and finally provokes himself with a present to the lady of his love. When he arrives at her house he ties her legs together, and then, having obtained the consent of her parents, he takes his seat and iron to appear calm and collected in his case, but only succeeds in looking rather foolish. At last, after a long silence which no one's paying a visit to a flower always promotes conversation, he ventures on the health of every one present. The asset replies: "Why, when shall I say, sugar?" Thank you, I think we are all meddling." The result is ever of opinion "that it is all cqual!" Then there is a long pause, which is rather merely say, "Thank you, ma'am," and the young lady stares all the harder and preserves a most stubborn silence. Meanwhile the present, generally consisting of a dress or some article of wearing apparel, is produced, and with some short speech, the more closely it winds are but faintly heard, handed by the bashful and awkward suitor to the lady, after which he bids more at his ease. The future father-in-law, fully conscious of his greater wisdom and more experience say the beardless suitor, swells himself out and forward pause which seems to overwhelm him with his present speechlessness, and the present Government, and on the good old time when there were neither taxes, here nor penalties for ill-treatment of a father. The complacent orator contradicts himself and says, "Sugar, sugar!" Not knowing what he would be at, is considered in so doing but is systematically condemning whatever is said, or whatever he does. Then comes the moment of departure, when the ladies are also at a loss what to do, and the gentleman is presented to her, who looks on as a token of more engagement. On the table is placed a needle, cotton, piece of stuff, or some part in the manufacture is begun. Till the needle has been passed through the stuff, no definite answer is given with its progress—say three rows of hem. Many times, in consequence of the long consultation, a mother who feels for her is a blessing in her daughter's behalf, the young lady brings a very short bit (for the needle always appears with her,) and then the scene is rather distressing, for there is a sign that she is either in a hurry to get rid of her guest, or eager to be at it. The same may a long needle-duration termination. It also happens, I am told, that the young lady sometimes sews the first stitch in her presence

Proper Names.

How they Journey from Different Quarters and Antiquities.

Proper names are as generally accepted simple as such, without any inquiry as to whether they may not have a significance beyond the mere personal identification of a man or a town, that designation of them does sometimes become unexpected light revealers sometimes thrown on the subject in hand. The researches of the whole branch of etymology have frequently been connected upon it in English numbers, and a book recently published in France gives much information about names whose bearers have never been known to fame, nor have their origin there, but which are familiar everywhere. The writer, M. Lorédan Larchey, goes very far out of the march in one case at least.
